The Space Between: Experience, Context and Process in the Therapeutic Relationship (Systemic Thinking and Practice Series) From Brand: Karnac Books

"This book, which comprises contributions from many well known authors, takes an important step in the field of family therapy towards linking many fruitful approaches. Sheila McNamee (2004) recently suggested that we have reached the point when we should be promiscuous rather than remaining faithful to one pure approach. This allows us to enrich our skills rather than confining them.

Nevertheless, we still need a shared focus. What better place to start than by exploring the space between the therapist and client. So much of our thinking has centered on both what therapists do, or what families are. Since the emergence of second order perspectives, however, there has been an increasing interest in how family and therapists mutually influence each other in the therapeutic relationship."-- John Byng-Hall from the Foreword

The latest volume in the Systemic Thinking and Practice Series focuses on THE therapeutic relationship between the family and the therapist, an element present in every therapy session. The chapters discuss the different aspects of the therapeutic relationship that can sometimes be very difficult or sensitive; unsuccessful therapy, cultural issues including language difficulties, same-sex couples, and therapist's use of herself within therapy. Clinical examples are found throughout the book to illustrate both positive as well as negative outcomes of therapy.

Contributors: Rhonda Brown, John Burnham, John Byng-Hall, Alan Carr, Carmel Flaskas, Jo Howard, Alfred Hurst, Ellie Kavner, Sebastian Kraemer, Britt Krause, Rabia Malik, Maeve Malley, Michael Maltby, Barry Mason, Sue McNab, Amaryll Perlesz, David Pocock, Hitesh Raval, Justin Schlicht, Lennox K. Thomas

'This book, which comprises contributions from many well-known authors, takes an important step in the field of family therapy towards linking many fruitful approaches. Sheila McNamee (2004) recently suggested that we have reached the point when we should be promiscuous rather than remaining faithful to one pure approach. This allows us to enrich our skills rather than confining them. Nevertheless, we still need a shared focus. What better place to start than by exploring the space between the therapist and client. So much of our thinking has centred on both what therapists do, or what families are. However, there is now an increasing interest in how family and therapists mutually influence each other in the therapeutic relationship.'- John Byng-Hall, from the Foreword

About the Author

Barry Mason is the Director of The Institute of Family Therapy in London. He has been involved in the training of family therapists and systemic practitioners since the early 1980s. He chairs the advanced training in supervision at the Institute, and co-chairs the doctoral programme. He is also involved in developing clinical, training and research aspects of a relational approach to the management of chronic pain.

Carmel Flaskas is a Senior Lecturer in the School of Social Work, University of New South Wales, Sydney, where she convenes the Masters program in couple and family therapy. Her contributions in family therapy include her work on the therapeutic relationship, on the translation of psychoanalytic ideas in the systemic context of work, and on knowledge and postmodernist ideas in therapy. With Amaryll Perlesz, she edited The Therapeutic Relationship in Systemic Therapy (Karnac 1996).

Amaryll Perlesz is a Senior Lecturer in Family Therapy and manages the academic programme at The Bouverie Centre, La Trobe University, Melbourne. Her current research interests include engaging rural schools around issues of homophobia and discrimination, exploring the interface between the private and public worlds of lesbian families, and using Theatre of the Oppressed techniques in training and supervision of family therapists.
